

A

AS

English Language

Paper 1 Language and the individual

7701/1

Transcript of texts from the Data Booklet

TEXT A : an article from the website of 'Rouleur' cycling magazine

TEXT B: a forum discussion from the website of 'Singletrack' cycling magazine

[Turn over]

TEXT A – ‘Rouleur’

Under the website title ‘Rouleur’ and beneath drop down tabs for Latest, Rider, History, Racing, Bicycles, Performance and Travels, and a picture of Lizzie Armitstead, is the text transcribed here.

Lizzie Armitstead

The British star talks fame and fakeness, how to beat Marianne Vos and British Cycling’s lack of a pathway for women.

Words by Andy McGrath

Photographs by Sam Needham

Forget a mid-life crisis; the quarter-life one is hitting Lizzie Armitstead hard. “I am old now and I don’t like it. Twenty-five is pretty old, don’t you think?” No way. I give a quizzical, look to encourage a reaction. “You’re a man, you’re all right: you don’t have to push a baby out. Now I am starting to think crap. What am I gonna do after cycling? What career am I gonna have? Everyone’s buying a house, getting married, having kids and I’m still a bit of a nomad.”

The time of year probably doesn’t help the feeling of unsettlement.

We’ve drifted out to early December, as distant from the racing season as you can get: nine weeks after her last race of 2013, another nine before the season gets underway. Normal life has caught up. Armitstead is at her parent's house in Otley, a world away from her first race in Qatar or her seasonal residence in Monaco, which she likens to Disneyland, clean and pleasant but ultra-fake.

Lizzie doesn't do phony. She has the kettle on and a mug of tea in my cold hand within minutes of me walking through the door. You can take the girl out of Yorkshire, but you can't take the Yorkshire out of the girl.

In her hands, she holds a London 2012 mug, adorned with five slightly faded colour rings. A few dishwasher trips too many, probably.

The Olympics. Let's get the O-word out of the way first. It's hard to avoid – it's what most people associate with Lizzie Armitstead – and the experience has informed a lot about her current state of mind.

It had always been about London 2012 for her. One day in July would define her whole career. Pressure? Just a bit. In the approach, she was a woman on the cusp of a breakdown. She wept on the train back home after getting ill at the Giro Rosa, worried that she'd compromised her chance.

It didn't help that her dad, John, had a habit of putting his foot in it when chatting to her on the phone as the race approached. "He manages to say the wrong thing. He's funny. He'd be like 'are you gonna beat Vos then?' Or 'but she's looking good though, isn't she?' "

[Turn over]

Armitstead rose to the challenge on the day to take Britain's first medal of the Games. Sometimes it seems easy for the public to forget – a Sky sports gameshow even announced her as Olympic champion – that she actually finished second, a bike length away from Marianne Vos, and from achieving what she had set out to do. I think she hesitates to feel complete happiness with the result, and it is hemmed in by the memory of the surrounding pressure. “Looking back, it was full on for a year. It was a relief when it was over,” she reflects.

For Rio 2016, she wouldn't change it. “I think it's a good thing. It never became ‘get me out of here, I don't want to do it’. I like having pressure, I don't perform without it.”

Her two weeks in the Olympic village went by in a blur. She wishes she'd written things down. She spent time doing laps of the post-Games dinner circuit, realising her finite appeal as a medallist. “I wanted to embrace all the things I got offered to do in the off-season,” she says.

So Armitstead sat on the same table as Stephen Hawking one night and met Prince William and Kate on another. Did she ever feel like she was losing touch with her normality? “No. Doing the whole celebrity thing made me realise even more that”- she drops her voice to a whisper, as if it's a secret – “actually, I'm not impressed by it.”

[Beside the main article is information about related products and the following information.]

Racing 23.06.14 [Underneath this heading is a picture of two cyclists racing and crowds gathered to either side of the race track.]

Was That it?

Tinkoff-Saxo rider Chris Juul-Jensen reflects on losing his Grand Tour virginity.

[Underneath this, there is a link saying, 'Continue reading'.]

Racing 25.06.14 [Underneath this heading is a white hexagon on a slate grey background and a speech bubble with a 'W' in its centre.]

Weekly Wibble: TUE or Not TUE, That is The Question

Stuff and nonsense from the week in cycling. June 25: Froome's TUE trouble, Roche's first stage race win and Big Mig goes slapstick.

[Turn over]

TEXT B – ‘Singletrack’

Bike Forum

Bike riding – health and fitness VS none cycling peers?

21 posts & 20 voices / Started 5 months ago by cruzcampo / Lastest reply from I_Ache

Tags: No tags yet.

cruzcampo – Member

I’m surrounded by people who love overeating, large quantities of crisps, sugary snacks with takeout food chasers at lunch. Evening crashing out in front of the telly, rinse and repeat mon-fri. 1-5 sick days a month is pretty standard, as is excess weight and lots of manflu throughout the year. By comparison I’ve not had a sick day off in 8 years, and shift colds/manflu incredibly quickly. I’d like to put a large part of it down to biking.

So how much would you say your biking attributes to your overall health and fitness, and how does it compare to your none cycling peers?

Posted 5 months ago #

scaled – Member

I’m off sick much less, in hospital much more [There is an emoticon with a grinning face beside the text.]
On a serious note though, having children seems to be a much better indicator of likely hood to be off sick. I know I suffer with sickness much more now the germ exchange is back in term time.

Posted 5 months ago #

jam bo – Member

‘By comparison I’ve not had a day off sick in 8 years, and shift colds/manflu incredibly quickly. I’d like to put a large part of it down to biking’

Children? Bet no. Biohazards.

Posted 5 months ago #

schmiken - Member

I imagine diet has a bigger effect than exercise.

Posted 5 months ago #

ton – Member

I have had about 12 weeks sick in the last 5yrs, including 4 operations. cycling is far from good for some people.

Posted 5 months ago #

[Turn over]

jam bo – Member

And 5 days a month off sick? These people still have jobs?

Posted 5 months ago #

philjunior – Member

I don't seem to get less colds and flu than my colleagues and sometimes it hits me like a tonne of bricks to be honest. I do have kids, and my wife until her maternity leave for the second one started was working as a childminder. I also don't eat particularly well if I'm honest. Too much convenient junk food to keep my energy levels up in the office.

Compared to some of my peers of similar age, though, I'm in pretty good shape, and I know I can go out and do stuff (walk up a mountain etc.) that they struggle with.

Edit – 1 to 5 sick days a month? Ok, far less than that for me. 1-2 a year at a guess.

Posted 5 months ago #

END OF TRANSCRIPT

There are no sources printed on this page

Copyright information

For confidentiality purposes, from the November 2015 examination series, acknowledgements of third party copyright material will be published in a separate booklet rather than including them on the examination paper or support materials. This booklet is published after each examination series and is available for free download from www.aqa.org.uk after the live examination series.

Permission to reproduce all copyright material has been applied for. In some cases, efforts to contact copyright-holders may have been unsuccessful and AQA will be happy to rectify any omissions of acknowledgements. If you have any queries please contact the Copyright Team, AQA, Stag Hill House, Guildford, GU2 7XJ.

Copyright © 2016 AQA and its licensors. All rights reserved.

IB/M/Jun16/7701/1/CD/E4