Section AAnswer Question 01.

Extract A

For about twenty years, from 1886, the dividing line between parties was that between 'Home Rulers' and 'Unionists'. The Liberal Party's commitment to Home Rule necessitated an alliance with the Irish Nationalist Party, without the support of which it could not acquire a parliamentary majority. The Liberals found themselves restricted given that the Irish issue was undoubtedly a vote-loser, the key issue keeping them out of government and turning the drift to the Right into a landslide. The Liberal Party frittered away much of the 1890s and the opening years of the new century on in-fighting and searching for unity. The Liberals only won a majority in 1906 because the Conservatives had managed to alienate almost every interest group in the land.

The turning point in late Victorian politics came in 1886, decisively breaking the long-standing Liberal hold on power. How are we to account for this? To a large extent the Conservatives were simply lucky: Gladstone's dramatic conversion to Home Rule hastened a split that had long been coming. However, the Conservative revival cannot be explained entirely by luck. The Conservatives had strengths too. The cautious financial policies adopted by Conservative governments helped to consolidate the new alliance with the middle classes. Party organisation was strengthened, covering nearly all parts of the country; the Conservatives clearly held together a wide range of support in all social classes sufficient to keep the party in power for the best part of twenty years.
