We live in a golden age of technology. In the twenty-first century, technological development has changed our lives more significantly than at any time since books were first printed. One example is the bank card. Although credit cards were first introduced over 70 years ago, few people thought that one day plastic cards would replace banknotes and coins, or that you would be able to pay for goods and services with your mobile phone. In recent years there has been such an increase in shopping on the internet that many traditional shops have gone out of business. This has caused a revolution in the way we buy things. Online we have much more flexibility. There are no opening hours or queues, we can compare products and prices, and we do not have to leave the house. But there are disadvantages too. We have fewer opportunities to meet people, the images we see can be deceptive because colours and size may be different in reality, and quality is often difficult to judge. In addition, not all websites are secure. Innovations are usually improvements, but they are rarely perfect.
