Henri Dupont lived with his wife in Santeuil near Paris. One Saturday evening, Mme Dupont told him to go and enjoy himself with his friends at the village café. She would be happy to stay at home where she would watch the television.

So, having said goodbye to his wife, he left the house at eight o'clock and walked towards the village square. On arriving there, he saw that several of his friends were already sitting at a table on the pavement and he greeted them.

They decided to play cards and they bought drinks. They had been playing for an hour when suddenly they heard someone shouting inside the building. They ran in to see what had happened.

A customer had fallen on the floor. He explained to them that he felt very ill. "We will telephone the hospital straightaway", said the man behind the counter, "and they will send a doctor who will be able to help you".

When the ambulance arrived five minutes later, the doctor got out, quickly examined the man and reassured him by saying that everything was normal. It was probably the heat in the room which had caused the problem. All would be well the following day.
