M. Dupont had decided to take his children to town for the day. His wife would stay at home where she could rest and read her newspaper. His son and daughter wanted to visit the local museum.

Last Saturday, they got up early, went to the station by taxi and caught the nine o'clock train. A lot of other people were travelling that day so they had to remain standing in the carriage.

On arriving at their destination, they went for a walk in the main street. In the afternoon, they headed for the museum which was near the river. M. Dupont left the children there and he went to a nearby bookshop.

After spending an hour choosing some books, M. Dupont suddenly looked at his watch and realised that it was late. He had promised to return before dinner. He set off for the station immediately.

Two hours later, he entered the house and saw his wife. “What an excellent day!”, he said to her. “You will be pleased to see the books which I bought”. “Good”, she replied, “but where are the children?”.
