Universities told to scrap ‘safe spaces’ and promote free speech

Chris Skidmore, the universities minister, says that, in recent years, universities have agreed to create ‘safe spaces’ where students are protected from opinions that might offend them. He feels that ‘safe spaces’ are against the principle of free speech.

The universities minister has now published a new fifty-three-page guidance document. This states that speakers should not be banned from universities just because they ‘offend, shock or disturb’ students.

It is the first time in thirty years that ministers have intervened to reinforce the Education Act of 1986. This Act gave universities and colleges the responsibility to promote free speech.

Government and politics in the Republic of Alpia*

In Alpia, citizens use proportional representation to elect representatives. The largest political parties in parliament choose an executive to govern the country. A president is elected by the executive. He or she serves for one year. A successor is chosen each year.

Citizens have the right to vote in referendums on a wide range of national and local matters including constitutional issues. If citizens disagree with a decision made by their government or parliament, they may challenge it by launching a referendum. Citizens can also put their ideas forward to be decided through a national or local referendum. National referendums are held four times a year on average.

Voter turnout is around 48 per cent.
A referendum in 2009 led to a ban on minarets.

Twenty-five per cent of the country's population are migrants to Alpia from different countries, including the UK. They have permission to work in Alpia but are not allowed to vote.

Alpia is not a real country.

*A minaret is a tower built next to or as part of a mosque.
