Historians have made different interpretations about the role played by the generals in the great loss of life during the First World War.

The following pieces of evidence refer to the role of the generals in the great loss of life during the First World War.

Study these and answer the question which follows.

Evidence 1

This interpretation is from Charles Messenger, a military historian who served as an officer in the armed forces during the 1940s and 1950s, writing in his book Trench Fighting, published in 1972.

He argues that the generals were not to blame for the great loss of life during the First World War.

It has been fashionable to criticise the generals during the war, as they continued to fight a trench war. But it must be remembered that they were all faced with an entirely new type of war, of which they had no previous experience. The task of the general in war is to win victories. Sooner or later one must attack and they did their best to do this.

Evidence 2

This evidence is from George Morgan, recalling his time as a soldier in the First World War, for a BBC interview in 1976.

He argues that the generals were to blame for the great loss of life during the First World War.

The generals continued to order wave after wave of attacks from the trenches, wasting thousands of lives with each attempt, long after it should have been clear that they could not succeed. It was slaughter. The commanders, Haig and Rawlinson, didn't care about us. I don't think they were bothered about human lives.

Evidence 3

This evidence is a photograph of soldiers in the trenches during a battle in 1915.
